Focus again falls on online retail security following eBay breach

Posted on:25/05/2014

By Martin Kovacs

Online retail security is again in the spotlight following last week's revelations eBay was the target of a cyberattack carried out between late February and early March this year in which a database containing customer information was compromised.

Releasing details of the attack, eBay urged its 145 million global users to change their passwords, stating the database contained encrypted passwords, email addresses, physical addresses, phone numbers and dates of birth.

John Debrincat, managing director and CEO of Australian secure eCommerce solutions provider eComer, stated it appears hackers accessed the database by carefully crafting and then sending an email to a number of people within eBay, who then opened it.

"It seems like they've tied it down to the fact that it was a small group of people on their own staff that got a phishing email that led to some malicious software being installed in their servers," he commented.

"So, it's one of the scary things that people in an organisation, who are inside behind the firewall, if they open an email that's got a malicious piece of software attached to it ... the attacker doesn't need to penetrate the firewall to get into the system."

Debrincat stated it is unclear why it took eBay so long to make a statement, noting this has not thus far been addressed by eBay.

He did, however, note if the hacker was trying to hack through the firewall it would leave a much different trace, stating "it's much more obvious sometimes to see that that's happened than coming in from behind the firewall".

It is not the first time hackers have employed such means of access, Debrincat added, noting it generally happens with larger corporations, with hackers preying on people's routines.

In the case of eBay, Debrincat speculated the hacker "probably knew who these people were, knew what their habits were, and probably preyed on their habits".

"The security measures that guys like eBay have, I think are probably very strong," he commented. "I think the key thing to consider is that it comes back down to individuals, and not systems, to be alert."

Organisations and individuals need to be aware of their habits, he added, right down to the most basic details, such as opening seeming innocuous emails.

"For merchants who run online stores, their first line of defence should be what they're doing internally themselves - which emails do they open, do they have their core systems on the same network that they use for their own email and their own internet surfing?" Debrincat stated.

"That's where I think the learning curve has got to come here - it's not just about stronger systems, because they are getting stronger all the time, but it's about how you use and consider those systems, and what you, both as a consumer and a merchant, think about your own security."
